

The Importance of Adjusting Investment Paths Based on an Investor's Shifting Long-Term Goals

Written by Michael Duncan

Life would be far less interesting if everything was neatly planned out to perfection and nothing shifted along the way. Long-term plans particularly may take many different twists and turns leading up to the arrival at your destination. And sometimes your planned destination itself may even change. There's nothing wrong with any aspect of changing your plans or long-term goals. From a financial standpoint, changes should be expected. Working closely with a financial advisor can help you make the appropriate adjustments at the right time and keep you on course to your long-term goals and objectives.

Detours Also Work to Get You to Your Destination

No matter your age or what your current situation is, having a long-term target gives you something to aim for. When you focus on that target, detours along the way won't seem like a big deal. The path to achieving your goals may constantly change, but your financial advisor is there to navigate you along the path. Think about your advisor as a pilot of an airplane. Not every route is going to be smooth, so sometimes detours have to be made to avoid turbulence. But even with some turbulence and the need to go around it, you will still safely get to your destination.

Goals Can—and Often Do—Change As Life Progresses

A long-term plan you made in your 30's may change when you reach your 50's. This could mean your long-term goals become altered and your destination shifted completely. It's natural to feel nervous or a sense of anxiety when making large-scale changes, but having a strong relationship with your financial advisor can make these decisions much easier. Shifts in financial planning aren't only limited to the path you take. They can also just as easily apply to the final destination. Both are completely normal parts of life and can be adjusted accordingly.

Always Discuss Your Current Path And Goals With Your Advisor

When you start to get a sense that your financial goals or strategies need to be altered, initiate a discussion with your financial advisor. Chances are your advisor may be on the same page as you already since they are frequently monitoring the market and seeing the same things you are. Every investment path can be altered. And when you collaborate closely with your financial advisor, you'll feel confident your altered path can still lead you to your final desired destination in life.
